

Moving Your Dream Forward

Here are a quick set of questions we ask potential clients to consider so they can start to get clear about their dream. When you have completed these questions, please return them to sagunasati@aol.com . We'll review them and begin a dialogue with you. This will really help us determine if your story has potential as a feature film.

In 3 to 4 sentences, explain what the film is about. What happens? What is the hook?

In your story, who will the audience identify with the most?

What will the main character (s) say and do to make the audience care about them?

What happens in the first 1/3 of the film to make the audience care about the main characters?

Who or what will make the main character (s) grow? Who or what causes the creative tension? Or put another way... who or what is the villain in your story?

How is the creative tension resolved? What happens at the end of your film?

Where will your story take place? Is that important? If you change the location, how does that change the story?

When will your story take place? Is that important? If you change the historical period, how does that change the story?

How much time passes during the story itself? Is that important? If you change how much time passes from the beginning of the story to the end, how does that change the story?

What do you see as the most memorable scene in your film?

If you have a serious story, which character, or what part of your film will provide some comic relief?

If you have a comedy, which character, or what part of the film will have some dramatic tension?

In what ways are the characters in your story believable?

In what ways are the characters compelling or different?

Who do you know that has the financial means and a possible interest in seeing your story become a feature film?

Who do you know that might be interested in helping you work on your film?

What do you see yourself doing on your film project?
